■Outline: Infectious diseases transmitted by blood-sucking arthropods are a major problem for human health, and the risk area continues to expand with recent global warming and globalization. Therefore, information sharing and monitoring with neighboring countries is necessary for predictive control of vector-borne infectious diseases. In this session, we will introduce the current status and issues of One Health in both Japan (Fukuoka) and China (Shanghai), as well as the future contents of exchange between the two countries.
