It also provided an opportunity for them to gain role models, particularly for those aiming to work in the field of international cooperation. Participants included international and Japanese students, as well as working professionals interested in careers in international cooperation. Three panelists active in the fields of international cooperation (health, transportation, and energy) shared their own global careers, followed by a Q&amp;A session and panel discussion, motivating participants to pursue global careers. Each panelist actively answered questions such as whether it is possible to succeed in international cooperation in one's own field or home country, how to secure a position given the recent budget cuts at international organizations, and the significance of international cooperation in other countries while facing domestic challenges. The panel discussion also addressed themes such as what students can do as a first step and the diversity of career paths in the field of international cooperation.
